

We had enchilada mole at this Laredo place 25 years ago. Mole is made from chocolate, peanuts, and chili powder. As far as I am concerned it was a waste of good chocolate.

One enclosed picture shows what I think is a side order of enchilada mole. The other picture shows the front of the place. There were no outside tables and a cart there then.

The typical ex-gas station parking lot had broken glass (in different places), and there were “insects” on the restroom walls. Most of the non-blancos were eating taco soup. We visited this place in the middle of the week, so the weekend must have been something (i.e. broken glass).

There are now several of these tex-mex places in southern Texas (according to the website). They must have gotten rid of the “insects” and glass.

How do I know the name of this place? Good question, I reply. I ordered a used small guide book "2 to 22 days in Texas" that was new in 1993. I just got it yesterday. It was a good book back then. We went down east Texas and up the (Rio Grande) valley the week after I retired. We had checked the book out of the library back then. We went to Laredo to sample the enchilada mole in the book.

The highlight of the trip was the free ferry into North Galveston where we saw dolphins. Also, we saw the old site of Indianola that was destroyed by a hurricane in 1875. The very old Oak tree so close to salt water was interesting too. It was a great trip.
